

In a world where unwanted clothing is piled as high as mountains, where synthetic fibres contaminate the oceans, and where the poorest of us work to satisfy the appetites of the wealthiest, our clothing choices aren't just about style - they're also ethical and political.

Repairing our clothing is more than just a practicality - it's a statement of intent; a small act of rebellion; a protest against a system obsessed with hyper-consumerism, an obsession which is highly exploitative and ultimately, self destructive.

By caring for what we have, we disrupt this system. By sharing skills of repairing and personalising our clothing, we keep the knowledge alive.

By reusing what others discard, we explore new ways to express our creativity.
